

Delivery

Repetitive and consistent, the task at hand was always present. It started the night before and culminated in the early dawn. Disciplined and patterned, one could set their clock by its precision. Oh, for sure there were the glitches that seemed to manifest themselves at the most inopportune moments, but nothing that couldn't be handled with a little creativity.

Over time, a process and a routine emerged similar to the day before. All in all, there was a rhythm to the event and a sense of expectation. So much so, that when the expectations were dashed some would become irate. Rarely comprehending the full story, anger and judgement could be thrown around making reconciliation difficult.

Delivering the early morning paper to a comatose world, in its pre-dawn blur, had its unique set of challenges, not dissimilar to the sharing of the Gospel. As with the paper, the Gospel is present, consistent, repetitive, descriptive and charged with expectations. It has become a way of life for many, offering a cadence to the rhythm and routine of daily living. The nurturing of attitudes, priorities, characters and values in the midst of passion is its hallmark.

To the interested, the curious, the seeker and the lost, it is a matter of sharing the story, of delivering the Gospel of Christ – our daily news!

NJP